

Most of us spend a lot more time in our inboxes than is actually good for us – it is known to increase our stress levels.

Also, the more time we spend on email, the less efficient we become at getting through it effectively.

Here are some tips to make the process much easier:

1. Enter your inbox with a mindset of action and not curiosity.

2. Emails are treated in one of the following ways:

Reply if it takes less than 2-minutes.

Put it in an @Action folder if it needs more thought (it's an idea to reply anyway to say thanks and that you want to give it more thought). Good idea to revisit these in a blocked off 20-30-minute period later in the day.

Put it in an @WaitingFor folder if you are in CC and need to keep track of it or if it is an important email which you sent that you need to keep an eye on.

Delete it if it is not relevant or put it in a relevant folder in case it may be important at a later date.

3. Be ruthless and hit unsubscribe if you feel a newsletter is no longer adding value for you.

4. Install Boomerang which enables you to pause your inbox while you reply to important correspondence without more emails coming in and distracting you. Make you sure you unpause it when you are ready to accept new correspondence again.

5. Create a personalised signature so that you do not need to repeat this process at the end of each email.

6. Save email templates that you can reuse for when you send the same email consistently.
