

This exercise is designed to help you recover your energy at home. To do that effectively, it helps to have a routine that ensures your time is used wisely from the moment you walk through the door.

- 1. Identify activities that you can do immediately on returning home in the evening that can create psychological distance between you and work?

(For example, changing into cosy home gear, having a shower, walking the dog)

- 2. What activities are not serving you well in the evening, ones that potentially leave you feeling guilty and lacking energy?

- 3. Have you got a plan in place to ensure that you don't let your evening get hijacked by too many trips to check your phone to see emails or social media contact?

4. How will you limit time web surfing, online shopping and TV bingeing?

(Bare in mind it's not cold turkey but limiting time spent on these to 40-60-minutes in total)

5. Keep in mind a tip for a rejuvenating evening which involves not going from 100% in the office to 0% lounging at home but a gradual deceleration to 60% in another direction. What family rituals or exercise or extracurricular activity could help your evening feel fulfilling and rejuvenating?

6. Pick the activity which you are most excited about:

7. Ask yourself: “How can I make this more likely to take place?” Take the next smallest action you can think of to engage in this activity, e.g. if you want to stretch more, then leave your yoga mat out clearly visible in the main living space.
